Book Excerpt

INTRODUCTION

“You can’t stop the waves, but you can learn to surf.” - Jon Kabat-Zinn

Change can be pretty scary. Whether we’re dissatisfied with our job, facing a redundancy or an organisational restructure, career challenges are inevitable. Yet when they hit they can leave us confused, anxious, fearful and stressed. This emotional roller coaster can erode our self-confidence and create confusion about what to do next.

So many of us try to control everything in our lives, including our careers, relationships, finances, physical environment and even our level of happiness! But, with all of this control, what happens to our ability to cope when a major change affects every aspect of our life?

Losing a job is one such change. In fact, losing a job is one of the most stressful events that can happen to us, only ranking below other major life-changing events such as death, divorce, personal illness or major injury. I’d go so far as to say job losses are causing even more stress today, with a range of additional pressures meaning that a steady job, or steady income, is more important than ever before. As the cost of living continues to rise, more and more couples need two incomes to cover their expenses, meaning that being out of work places significant strain on your finances.

Additionally, finding a new job can be even more of a challenge today, with greater competition as more degree-qualified Gen Ys and Millennials enter the job market, more baby boomers take longer to retire, and more jobs are farmed off-shore. This means that, once you’re out of a job, it may be months before you find something new, adding more strain to your finances, relationships and health.

And because our careers have a greater impact on our lives than ever before, it’s very unusual for any of us to go through a career transition without experiencing several other challenges in our lives as well. I know many clients and friends who have experienced a job loss or redundancy and, at the same time, have also had to deal with the stress of a marital separation or divorce, or had recently become parents, or had seriously ill relatives to take care of while looking for a new role.

No matter how much we try to plan for smooth sailing, all of us know that change is inevitable. In fact, as the Greek philosopher Heraclitus (535BC–475BC) said, “Nothing endures but change. Change is the only constant.”

So if we know that change is inevitable, in our careers and in our lives, why do so many of us struggle with it? Through discussions with over 8,000 clients over the past 19 years, I’ve found that there are three main reasons we experience resistance and reluctance to accept change, and feel so uncomfortable when it happens.
